How Locksmiths Choose Their Day of the Week Locksmiths tend to work throughout the year, and many even work in shifts. Most often, these workers are chosen from the same pool of candidates at different times of the year. This practice allows them to get paid better when they work, and they can usually find more work. Typically, they'll start their shift on the weekend, and keep with that rhythm until the next Sunday. Locksmiths choosing their days of the week to work is a big part of their career and that of their company. It also has an impact on their family life. And when you factor in the additional expenses, it can add up to serious money. So what makes a locksmith choose their days of the week, and how does this affect their home life? Locksmiths tend to go to work on Saturday, and this is understandable. It's the only day of the week they really have time off. That means that they have time to relax before they have to get back to work again on Sunday. After they've taken off, they'll often come home and cook dinner for their family or friends. On Sundays, they'll spend time with their family at church, and they'll usually wind down by finishing up a few projects around the house. When Locksmiths Have a Shift Not all locksmiths work every day of the week. Some will only work on the weekends, because that's when they can make the most money. Because they can charge more for service when they work on weekends, most of the time they'll pick this time of the week when they can get the best deal for their clients. Because they're taking the majority of their paychecks on weekends, they'll have to be extra careful about their money. Even a day of the week can make a big difference. However, it can be tough for some locksmiths to stay away from work on the weekend. In these cases, they'll usually work on Friday or Saturday, and take Sundays off. Another option for them is to work Monday through Wednesday, with an occasional weekend shift. Most companies won't ask them to work on the weekends, because they
