Where I am from, the reality is far different. In my home state of Texas, a sizable percentage of my fellow residents support a law mandating that immigrants be put in jail if they try to find jobs. When I tell these people about my home, they look at me as if I were speaking German, even though I speak perfect English. We have a law in Texas that is modeled on English law, but it is a non-binding law. We are a non-binding entity. When a state passes a law, it is a legislative body that has the ability to put its views into law. The legislature makes a decision on a proposal, and a legislative body can change that law at any time. By contrast, a law passed by Congress, or a U.S. Constitution becomes the law of the land. Only a few days left to Double your gift! On Tuesday, April 16, B.C. Premier Christy Clark was forced to issue a news release that, surprisingly, was actually in the form of an open letter to President Obama: "We are living in a crisis in Canada," she said. "We will not wait for our Prime Minister to come to the rescue." With 13 days left in his administration, Obama couldn't be persuaded to act, but he did make it clear that Canada must get involved. Canada's Liberal Party has one full day left to make up the 8,000 votes it lost in the October election. The Conservatives have far more seats, but they just can't get enough support to form a government. If a party can't win a majority on the first ballot of a federal election, it's thrown to the second ballot. There, it needs votes from at least half of the elected MPs. In this case, it'll take 180. The outcome is also key to two other important stories: Canada's general election is poised to hinge on the fate of Stephen Harper's Conservative Party. According to the polls, the Tories have been running neck-and-neck with
