Wpa Kill 2.1.7 MP3 Download. 0 - 2.1.7)A disease that causes cancer, stroke, and heart disease – coronary artery disease – is on the rise. In a recent study, researchers were stunned when they found that rates of coronary artery disease among middle-aged women are actually declining. In men of the same age, the rates are actually going up. Why the sudden reversal? As the authors explain, it's not that women are becoming more health-conscious or that men are ignoring their health risks. With the rise of obesity, diabetes, and other diseases, these numbers should be higher than ever. Instead, this improvement in heart disease rates in middle-aged women is one of the best trends in all of medicine. And, it's not about better treatments or increased awareness. It's about women actually deciding to change their health habits. Women are making lifestyle changes that are holding them not only free of heart disease, but free of the diseases that come along with it. What lifestyle changes have women been making? Researchers agree that the best thing women can do to lower their risk of heart disease and stroke is to stop smoking, adopt a healthier diet, and exercise more frequently. But, the study authors were surprised to see how women are improving their health in other ways. For example: Obesity has declined in women, but remains high in men. Alcohol consumption has declined in women, but not in men. Worsening sleep quality has been declining in women. In contrast, levels of physical activity and lower-fat dairy consumption have been improving in both men and women. How are women succeeding at these changes? The authors believe that it's all about women gaining control of their health and taking on the responsibility of keeping it in check. "Women are motivated," write the researchers. In other words, middle-aged women are becoming more interested in their health and getting educated about heart disease. They are paying attention to the signs that their bodies are showing, and they are getting prompt medical
