DESCRIPTION: (Applicant's abstract) Up to 80% of patients with non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC) are diagnosed at stage III and out-of-date. Although methods to identify high-risk individuals among stage III patients have improved over the past few years, the same improvements have not been seen in the prediction of recurrence in stage IIIA patients. Early identification of those at high-risk would allow appropriate use of adjuvant therapy and survival improvement. We propose to establish a tissue-based predictive model for recurrence in stage IIIA NSCLC patients. We hypothesize that the presence of a neoplasm-associated gene signature alone or in conjunction with histopathologic stage, tumor grade, necrosis, and age will provide a more sensitive predictive test than any current method. The model will be developed using formalin-fixed paraffin-embedded (FFPE) tumor tissue from 80 stage IIIA NSCLC patients

Psychology of Stress Reduction Part I: The Origins of Stressful Situations Being in a state of ongoing stress is one of the most pervasive human conditions.
Learning how and when stressors arise in a person's life is the first step in becoming a more resilient person. Knowing when to best use your time and energy can be stressful and confusing. Learning how to best manage a situation that is stressful (or about to become stressful) allows the person to succeed and adjust to the experience effectively. Personality, health, and risk of disease and premature death are all interconnected; and this is partly due to the response of the body to stress. Being in a stressful state causes a cascade of biochemical changes and physiologic activity that begin as a response to a perceived threat. In the short term, this response is intended to keep us safe. However, if this response is continuous it becomes part of a person's stress reactivity and is associated with high cortisol levels, poor health, and weight gain. Ironically, these stress-related changes serve to protect a person from future stressors, making the person more vulnerable. The body's response to stress varies as
