The effect of opioid receptor-specific ligands on catalepsy is blocked by naloxone in vivo. The involvement of opioid receptors in the effect of the opioid receptor-specific ligands naloxone and naltrexone on catalepsy was investigated in mice.

Naloxone 1 mg/kg injected intraperitoneally (i.p.) significantly increased the duration of catalepsy, while naltrexone 1 mg/kg injected i.p. significantly decreased the duration of catalepsy. These effects on catalepsy were blocked by injections of naloxone at 1 mg/kg i.p. At this dose, naloxone injected i.p. reversed the effects of naloxone administered s.c. and i.v. on catalepsy. These results suggest that a peripheral site of action of naloxone is different from that of the opioid receptors.
