For the first time in history, the eradication of poliovirus is more likely than the reinfection of a population with the virus, according to a study led by a researcher from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. According to the study by researchers at the CDC and other institutions, the worldwide effort to eradicate polio was more successful than expected. The results were published today in the New England Journal of Medicine. "The good news is that it is more likely that a child in any given year will have never been infected with polio than that the child will be reinfected," said Nima Moazami-Goudarzi, a CDC epidemiologist and author of the report. This is the third time that Moazami-Goudarzi, whose lab has been studying polio since the 1960s, has led a study on eradicating the virus. The world has now been polio-free since 1996. Most countries have stopped having the virus in circulation after 2001 and have not seen a case since. However, Moazami-Goudarzi said only 50 percent of children have been fully immunized, which is not enough to stop the virus. "We need to raise the level of immunization to get to the point where the world is fully immunized, so that we can kill the virus globally," she said. "We know that we can reach that goal." Moazami-Goudarzi became concerned about polio decades ago, when she was a child in Iran. Most of the children in her village had polio, but some children did not and were at risk of becoming infected. At the time, the only polio vaccine available was a live virus vaccine, which meant children could not be vaccinated, she said. The polio vaccine developed today is a killed virus vaccine. "The concept behind the vaccine is that the virus is killed when it is brought to the human intestine, which inactivates the virus. It is not needed in the stomach or in the
