A microfluidic device has been constructed for the trapping, detection and separation of biological cells and bacteria by combining immunomagnetic separation, flow cytometry and high performance liquid chromatography (HPLC). The device consists of a magnetically stabilized channel for cell isolation, a stacked micro-capillary HPLC separation column and a flow cytometer for optical measurements. The process of cell and bacteria separation was demonstrated using engineered Escherichia coli (E. coli) and HL60 cells as model biological specimens. Magnetically labeled cells are trapped in the device and transported by fluidics along the channel. The cells can be quickly separated from the sample by applying a magnetic field and released into a second fluidic channel, which is followed by further measurements. The results show that the device is suitable for analytes at levels down to single cells. It could also separate and subsequently measure living and dead cells at low concentrations. The issue of sexual harassment on college campuses is a growing concern for many and in June 2015, the Obama administration issued Title IX guidance requiring schools to have sexual misconduct policies and procedures. But that guidance has only been in the courts since this June. Now, the government is trying to make the "Dear Colleague" letters more enforceable through a change to a 1993 law known as The Higher Education Act. On Monday, the U.S. Department of Education's Office of the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights (ASCR) released their request for public comment on a proposed regulation that would add a special definition of sexual harassment to the definition of Title IX.
