"We are very excited to use the experience of the players in order to give the players a new dimension to the gameplay and the game-play experience itself," said Peter Eriksson, Head of FIFA and all sports at EA SPORTS. "With this we enhance a lot of our disciplines within football in a realistic way and using the technology in the match allows us to make a game that plays in a realistic football world." The technology was developed by a large team of FIFA developers at PES's London branch. "The feedback we received from the players at the Worldwide Invitational event in London was very good and PES SoccerNet users also gave a positive opinion on our new technology. We are very pleased and excited about FIFA 22. It is an important evolution in our game design. We will always strive to bring the best football games to our fans." said Kazunari Takemura, managing director at Konami Digital Entertainment. "With the introduction of this technology it means that we can start a new chapter for FIFA, and the game-play will be more realistic and exciting for the players." said Daniel Paletta, Lead Designer at PES. "FIFA is an essential part of any sports game and by incorporating motion capture technology into our football game we can create a completely new experience. The technology can also be used to create a whole new range of new features such as tackling and aerial challenges." "The players are great supporters of our game and like the brand. We are very excited that FIFA will be the first football game to feature 'Hyper Motion' technology." said Fredrik Cordmar, managing director at Nordic Games. FIFA 16 was awarded the E3 Editors' Choice award, and is ranked number one in the U.S. by both NPD and Gfk Chart-Track. FIFA 16 sold 2.7 million units in the U.S. during its launch week. The worldwide sales of FIFA 16 have now surpassed 13.4 million units sold.
