Wednesday, September 25, 2014 The "try it yourself" approach to deploying reconnaissance drones is a step in the right direction. But is it enough for students to effectively carry out research for their projects? This is the question I set out to answer when I created the Spreading the Word project. In my research, I discovered that while a great number of universities have workshops and labs that would be perfect for conducting automated aerial reconnaissance, getting an agreement signed and enrolled students to take advantage of it is one of the tougher parts of getting into unmanned systems research. Which is one of the things that Spreading the Word tries to solve. Going to school is expensive, and the fact that many universities don't provide enough in-person tutoring for unmanned systems may be one of the reasons why a lot of students don't have the basics of how to program their drones down already. One of the features of the Spreading the Word project is to allow any student to get a university-approved drone shipped to them, in order to get them started down the unmanned systems path. While getting all of the students (and the university in the process) to use this technology, I noticed a big problem: Spreading the Word is only as effective as the quantity of it the University finds willing to put out and the quantity of it the students can afford. The story was told to me by a sophomore aeronautical engineering major about the process of getting her hands on a drone from a university that tried to do this, only to find that the university and companies were out of drones because they were being used for training. While this is a case where it's understandable that more drones would be a problem, it's pretty difficult to tell if the problem was that the program didn't find enough people interested in its models, or if the models were only returned because the company that had them weren't making any more. It's one of the ideas that hopefully the wide-scale use of Spreading the Word will solve. Once a set of university drones has been assigned to a professor to use, that professor will be able to encourage students in their class to take them out for test flights. But for some students, they may not have the manpower to do this. It's a really expensive proposition, and not one that can realistically be made financially viable by companies, schools, or other commercial drone manufacturers. Which is why the Spreading the Word project is meeting needs that haven't been met before by anyone (including other
