It's been a while since my latest blog post. I felt like there were so many things I wanted to cover that it was just impossible. So here, as promised, is a bit of an overview of my projects, their progress and what I have in store for them all. 1. Support for displaying generic Views This has been my main focus so far, but I'm not finished yet. I've just been tinkering with the basics and how to get them on screen, which isn't that easy. (I'm planning to release a tutorial for this soon). The finished version will contain a view which can be used to display a generic 'tree' of data. It will contain support for custom data types and arbitrary relationship types. This is something I'm really excited about and hopefully you'll be too. In fact, the more support for Views there is the more my purpose for the stack will be fulfilled. 2. Support for primitives Oh how much I want this. I really hope to be able to push this one out soon. This will provide the best syntax for handling data I think. There are lots of challenges with this, not least getting the type system right. I have some idea of how to get there, but how to get it implemented will be the tricky part. 3. More external APIs and helpers I've written some simple wrappers for NSData, NSString, NSSet and a bunch of other APIs I've used in the past. I've currently got some documentation on them and a few unit tests to accompany them. There are still some API headers I need to work on as well and I'd like to get some more APIs on board too. I'm planning on dumping all this stuff into a GitHub repository so people can grab it for themselves. I'll be sure to give credit where credit is due and link to the location where the source can be found. 4. Additional unit tests and documentation Just to round off this list, I'm planning on adding more unit tests and some documentation to the main documents directory. I've actually been plugging away at this for the last two weeks and I've finally gotten up some documentation for the view api. I've also got some basic unit tests for my view layer.
