Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an image processing apparatus, a transmitting and receiving apparatus, an image processing method and a computer program product, which can convert the number of bits assigned to image data, and a method of transmitting and receiving the data. 2. Description of the Related Art When electronic commerce, via the Internet or an intranet, is performed using the image communication technique, data is transmitted and received between computers. When electronic commerce is performed, there is the fear that a third party who stole a user's password may transfer the data. Therefore, digital watermarking, which does not leave any information that can be read by a third party, is currently used. Digital watermarking is a technique for leaving no information that can be read by a third party when image data is compressed, transmitted and received. The technique has application for preventing illegal copying of digital images, such as photographs, and protecting copyrights. For example, when image data is transmitted, digitally watermarked compressed image data having no human-per
