What's New In?

Notebook: Rapids top United By Alex Von Schwarzer | October 18, 2013 at 6:02 pmUPDATED: October 18, 2013 at 6:02 pm There was a time when I knew the MLS season well. The same day I would tune into the Philadelphia/DC United match, I would sit down at my computer and watch the Union play. Back in the day, the Union were one of the best teams in the Eastern Conference, finishing runner-up to D.C. United at the 2006 Supporters' Shield. For me, the Union was the team that I watched in the past. I would cheer on the Union, the league's best "small market" team. I would root for them, not because I thought they would win anything major, but because they were such a great team. They had a great mix of veterans and young players, and they had a well-respected manager in John Hackworth. Back then, I cheered for the Union because I knew that playing at the Philly SoccerPlex was great. I would get to go to the game at historic Franklin Field, and I would see a passionate Philadelphia crowd. It's hard to see the Union today. Prior to Sunday's match at PPL Park, the Union have not won in 13 games. They are last in the Eastern Conference, and they only have two wins in their last 10 games. Their two wins were against the mediocre New England Revolution and the Central Texas Strikers. The Union didn't score until the eighth minute in their match on Sunday. By the time they had the chance to score, they were already trailing, 1-0. Philadelphia needed a response after a Brandon McDonald header from a free kick in the 34th minute. Only two minutes later, D.C. United would score the only goal of the match, 1-0. I think the biggest issue for the Union is being out of form and falling behind the pack in the Eastern Conference. When I watch the Union play, I realize they are not good enough. They are one of the worst teams in the league. They have no purpose on the field, and they are content to give up the first goal and hope for a comeback. This is a team that has two goalscorers in Danny Mwanga and Warren Creavalle. Mwanga and Creavalle are not
