This article aims to categorize the language of grief and bereavement. This study aimed to explore (a) the nature of language in grief and bereavement, (b) the language of the hospice carer and patient, (c) the relationship between the language of bereaved relatives and the hospice carer, and (d) the relationship between the language of hospice carers and the patients who died within the hospice. A total of 73 bereaved relatives of patients who died within the hospice were recruited via community bereavement groups and completed the Grief Reaction Inventory. Interviews with bereaved patients and hospice carers regarding the patient's death were also completed. These data were analysed qualitatively using Giorgi's (Giorgi, 1989) method. Grief, bereavement, and the process of dying were reflected by expressions of sad, bereaved, bereavement, and dying. Grief could be reflected by terms such as sad, bereaved, and bereavement; bereaved could be reflected by terms such as mourn, pain, and mourning; dying could be reflected by terms such as reach the end, death, and end. A theory of grief was created

What's new in Zaccaria Pinball - Top Hand Table:

Tuesday, January 31, 2009 Strange Months and Strange Days This is the end of a long, strange year and it is somewhat disheartening to think that it will be another 6 months before I have another blog post to read on the Starmaps Ho! blog, 12 months later. Still, we have had a good few fun months and I want to share a bit of the archaeology of the 2010s with you. The last few months have really focused on sound archaeological image development and this month we began publishing some published research on endangered archaeological sites in China and several other countries. There are a number of interesting stories here including the retrospective on a unique archaeological site on Xima, Yunnan, the Future of Archaeology in China conference (which I will report on in two posts), the story of the Republic of China's troubles with a local Park authorities during excavations, and the sad case of a team of Danish archaeological researchers who have spent several years working on a site in southwest China only to find their dig site actually an asbestos mine from an old mining village that used to surround the dig. Scrape marks on a stone may indicate an attempt at tool manufacture (Image: Beijing Normal University) The Xima site is the first site that I ran across after becoming an archaeologist. A colleague at the University of Urumqi in Xinjiang, where I was at the time, told me that there was a rare set of protohistoric features at the site that I might find interesting and I made plans to visit. So on a long overdue travel trip, I managed to visit the site in July and it had just been dug up and I was struck by the unique combination of having Bronze Age burials with very few of the usual features associated with Bronze Age burials in the typical West/Central/South Asian model. I remember one particular burial that had a half dozen ceramic jars, four of which had been broken to jar the remains of a man and the other four, broken jars held three other major organs. There seemed to be an overall abandonment, but as I thought about this, I really thought that this was very unique indeed. So some months later, after consulting the ever reliable Zhang Dali of the Institute of Archaeology at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, I think I began to start getting interested in this site. We both thought that the site might be related to the Chuo, a Chinese Bronze Age people that we've worked on in
