What's New in the?

Ion-imprinted polymers (IIPs) were introduced for the first time by Girard and Murray in 1980. A subsequent systematic review by Vögele-Müller disclosed the advantages of this class of material (a number of references can be found in the article entitled "Ion-imprinted polymers: part 1. Polymers for the recognition of analytes" by A. Mathias, Polymers in Separation and Purification, 1991, Chapter 1.2). The high density of ion imprints can be related to the introduction of physico-chemical cross-linking reactions, that, in turn, determines the selectivity of the material for the target analyte. These polymers display in addition good chemical stability, a possible homogeneity and regularity, as well as long shelf-life under ambient conditions. However, the desired imprinting mechanism is only a partial realization as the incorporation of the target molecules into the polymer network is not complete and is thus not reversible. A complete statistical realization of the polymer network structure is obtained only during the course of template elution. Thus, the recovery of the template is a necessary part of the overall process. A plurality of strategies has been described in the prior art to improve the efficiency of eluting the template from the polymer matrix. Thus, U.S. Pat. No. 6,627,156 B2 discloses the use of a heterobifunctional cross-linking reagent (usually a difunctional epoxide) that produces cross-links between two otherwise separately polymeric networks or between two different polymer chains, one bearing the imprinted and the other one bearing the template molecule(s). The template molecule(s) can be derivatized with at least one group containing a nucleophilic functional group (amino, hydroxy, epoxy, azide). Such a network can thus be hydrolyzed to a single chain network and can be treated thermally or chemically to create a monomer that can in turn be used to create a new imprinting polymer. WO 2008/064181 discloses the use of single-chain polymeric imprints which are created by polymerization of a single chain (monomer) bearing the template molecule(s). The polymerization can be supported by a template-functionalized inorganic or organic support material. WO 2009/041828 discloses the use of single-chain polymeric imprints which are created by polymer
