Rival Internet Service Providers (ISPs) have been fighting it out over the past decade over what bandwidth they should use for what price. As a result, we've been forced to fight a constant battle over which ISP we use, and which one sucks less. We pay our ISP (in the US) for the amount of speed it can provide us, but really we're paying for the connection. It's like paying for a street then finding out there was an extra street used to get to it. Nobody told me. I was just supposed to know that it exists. Here's the deal: Think of bandwidth like money for the internet. We're paying for a certain amount, but we also have unlimited data. The goal is to get the most for your money, so we're constantly on the hunt for the best deals in internet bandwidth. But it's not that simple. When it comes to speed and price, we are often stuck between two or three options. So, when you go to a website, you're usually presented with a page that shows: Your current option, like your current ISP, (cable, satellite, fiber, etc.) One or two options you've picked that may fit your needs Two or three generic alternatives you can pick
