The Democrats have come back from the desert convinced they have what it takes to win in November. The “blue wave” that was supposed to carry the midterm elections to the party of Donald Trump now has many Democrats thinking they are on the brink of a generational shift in American politics. “We have a much better ground game and message going forward,” Democratic National Committee Chairman Tom Perez told reporters in a conference call after meeting with top Democrats and operatives at the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC). “We are in position to match up in terms of both intensity and resources.” Democrats believe the enthusiasm among new voters, made up of people who had never voted in an election before the 2018 cycle, could be their best advantage. A recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll found that nearly eight in 10 of them said their first choice was the Democratic Party. “I think on [voter] intensity, we’re going to run neck and neck with Republicans,” Rep. Cheri Bustos, the chairwoman of the DCCC, said on the call. “We have a much better ground game and message going forward.” The House Democrats’ campaign arm has been testing those claims, spending more than $15 million on digital ads, tracking polls and ground organizing in the most targeted congressional races in the nation. “The social media data is what’s keeping us optimistic,” said Jessica Post, a DCCC spokeswoman. On the conference call, Perez called into question whether there was truly a “blue wave” coming in the midterms. Republicans had raised more
