The invention relates generally to the field of photometry and more particularly to a photometry system wherein selected one or more photometric parameters, e.g., the spectral response of the system or the spectral response of a photometric filter, can be varied in response to user inputs. Photometry is a common laboratory technique for determining the concentration of a given species, e.g., a reagent, which is usually measured as the amount of light of a selected wavelength absorbed by the species. A photometer can be, and is frequently, calibrated using a standard solution having known concentrations of the species. Since the spectral response of the phot
