Â Chapter 2: Using the CALC in VBA The use of Office's construct functions in VBA requires no programming knowledge as long as the construct is used simply as an interface to its data tables. The information to follow will teach you how to use construct functions in VBA. If you don't have an idea of the construct in Excel's VBA reference, use the construct, construct function, or VBA field search on the Web to find the information you need. Calculate functions The calculation functions of the construct, construct.calculate, and calculate. field methods are used to: * Sum, average, or count the values of a specified field. * Combine values of a field by adding them. * Find the max and min values of a field. * Find the value of a particular cell in the specified row. If you know the primary and alternate functions of the functions but want to know how to use them in VBA, use the construct.calculate, calculate.field, or calculating. used in the field search. If this search doesn't bring up the correct function, visit the Office website for Excel and look under the "Developers" section. To do it the hard way, calculate.field and calculate. are used as follows: ' Application.Field("Fieldname"). ' Application.Calculate. To do it the hard way, construct.calculate and calculating. use as follows: ' Application.Concatenate. ' Application.Fields("Fieldname"). ' Application.Calculate. To use any of these methods, you must have the workbook open and the sheet activated. For more information, you can visit the following Web sites: Using construct functions in VBA To use a construct function in a VBA application, you must understand its method. If you are new to VBA and cannot explain construct functions in English, check the Office website under "Customization" and "Developer Center" for
