Q: What would be the etiquette for a head of school asking a professor to re-evaluate a research proposal which is rejected for an awkward reason? As a student of a reputable and prestigious school, I have applied for a research grant which was rejected because the identity of the principal investigator was misattributed to a minor department. This department is well-known and the principal investigator is well-regarded in the department. Moreover, the PI is just a member of the department and not the principal investigator. Due to this misunderstanding, we realized the purpose of the grant was not applicable and we decided to re-write the proposal and resubmit it. We have done this. Later the department has expressed that they would like to collaborate on the work, but the head of the department has seen the above process (that we rejected for a minor department) and then asked the PI whether he wants to collaborate. The PI has declined to collaborate. Now I would like to know what would be the proper way to handle this. The problem is that the head of the department is the professor who passed us for the research project, and we did not know that he is the principal investigator (since he is well-regarded in the department). Would it be rude to ask the professor to re-evaluate the research project? What is the correct way of handling this situation? A: No, it's not rude to ask your principal investigator to review your proposal, or work on it with you. In fact, as the PI of a multi-PI project, you should be asking him to help you succeed as much as possible. However, if you have now resolved the problem and the PI doesn't want to work with you on the project, you have to decide for yourself whether you want to pursue it

The process of getting a game that's been released on a disc to work natively in older versions of Linux is not a simple one. If you don't mind dualbooting with Windows it's fine, but we show you how to get xbmc working on linux on a single machine. You will need to install the XBMC Installer. The first thing you will do is add this repo for the XBMC Installer, and install it if it is not already installed.

The Persona music collection comes in a huge collection of approximately 1,200 different songs. The collection includes songs from recent games as well as the older games. The demo is in Japanese, but we can get this to work with subs for the most part.

This is a quick example of using the Persona music collection in xbmcubuntu. We are just going to load up a song in a media player, go into the XBMC Settings, and press the Add Collection button. The first prompt will require you to enter a repository on the web. We will use Persona since its something we have collected ourselves, but we could have clicked the Browse... button and pressed [XBMC Installer].

Once we are in an XBMC media center we can now select the Persona music collection from the...
