HyperMotion technology is currently used by NBA 2K and NHL 2K and can be applied to players, stadiums, gameplay and more in FIFA. It transforms the game into something that more closely emulates the way soccer is played in the real world, especially around the goal. You can watch the full EA SPORTS Fifa 22 Free Download FIFA World Cup PES demo to see it in action: From FIFA to PES In the last 15 years, FIFA has won just over 10 years of consecutive global sales. This year, FIFA World Cup was launched with a fierce battle between PES and FIFA. The result? FIFA edged out PES and sold nearly twice as many units. FIFA 22 has been developed in close collaboration with Konami, using data from the previous FIFA World Cups to enhance gameplay. The big move of the feature, however, has been to use real-world player data. Over the course of this year's FIFA World Cup, FIFA players around the world have been captured on ground motion capture suits in order to produce the best possible gameplay. Using this data, the developers have been able to produce more realistic gameplay for both dribbling and passing. The data is even used to power the artificial intelligence (AI) system, which is at its best when passing the ball. FIFA allows players to pass the ball in virtually any direction, and this development has been improved. Players can now pass in a more consistent way with passing being more realistic. For example, PES players can pass the ball with more precision, while FIFA players can slide a pass into a running player. The defender is also being redesigned. By combining real-life player movement and data, the realism of defenders has been raised. They are now more responsive and can intercept passes or challenge players more effectively. Goalkeepers Keepers have never been as efficient as they are in FIFA 22. The aim of goalkeepers is to block shots or leap to play a shot. When they perform, their reactions and movements are shown clearly. With the implementation of real-world player data, these movements have now been added, meaning that the game will be more realistic. "Triple Pressed" FIFA 22's goalkeeper system has been evolved. With the "Triple Pressed" system, goalkeepers are now more reactive to shots. This new system gives goalkeepers more time to react to a shot.
