Access to the .Congenital talipes equinovarus: the spectrum of diagnostic imaging and treatment. Although primary treatment of congenital clubfoot is casting, the initial radiologic evaluation is critical to identify associated anomalies, which affect the choice and timing of casting. The 3 most common and severe comorbidities include neurovascular disease (e.g., vascular compromise, tibial neuropathy, popliteal pterygium, or posterior tibialis tendon hypoplasia), short tibial syndrome (tibial hemimelia, rarely tri-radial, di-radial), and Möbius syndrome. The workup includes radiography and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) of the entire lower extremity and at the ankle. If there is a suspicion for vascular compromise, MRI angiography of the lower extremity should be performed. Treatment of clubfoot in the first year of life should be done in a multidisciplinary setting and has evolved to include, in order of descending priority, percutaneous Achilles tenotomy, posterior tibial tendon tenotomy, and metatarsal osteotomy; all with various degrees of success. Hospital course in a sickle cell carrier with severe acute hepatitis: Not a typical picture. Hepatitis A virus (HAV) infection is relatively rare in North America, but a prior fatal case of HAV infection in a female homozygous sickle cell carrier presented similar clinical features that are often seen in acute fulminant hepatitis. A 72-year-old previously healthy female developed acutely worsening nausea, vomiting, and malaise. There was no history of recent travel or gastrointestinal bleeding. She was found to be coagulopathic, with a prolonged prothrombin time, abnormal liver enzyme tests, and ultrasound demonstrating an enlarged, heterogeneous liver with moderate ascites. She was diagnosed with HAV infection and admitted to the hospital. Although she appeared to recover rapidly with supportive care, three days later her liver 6d1f23a050
