Temperature monitoring systems generally rely on processing power in order to calculate and display real-time temperature data, which is normally presented on a screen or via an external hardware display device.

Since screens require visual processing and hardware displays are bulky and heavy, these existing devices are both expensive and inconvenient. One example of a thermal imaging system that can be used to monitor a temperature of an object is disclosed in EPO 557 944 A2. The camera is positioned so as to see a flame and the images are displayed for the camera during a lighting mode in order to observe a temperature of a flame. The connection allows the processor to use the images to query the database for information and to format the images for display. There are some drawbacks to such a system. Firstly, since an external database is used to store an image base, the database must be correctly located in order to provide the correct images. If a database is not located correctly, or if a database cannot provide the correct images, the system will not be able to give the user an accurate view of the temperature of a flame. Such a system also requires the user to remember to initiate the lighting mode (i.e. the system only works when the lighting mode is initiated).

Another example of a thermal imaging system that can be used to monitor a temperature of an object is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 6,683,066 B1. The system disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 6,683,066 B1 includes a camera, an LED light source and a processor unit to process images from the camera. The camera is mounted in
