Similar data has been previously described on the age distribution of HIV infected youth \[[@pone.0202895.ref029], [@pone.0202895.ref030]\]. Half of our participants were on ART and the majority of them (98.5%) were receiving their treatment within the last six months. Similar rates have been documented in Kenya \[[@pone.0202895.ref018]\]. The relatively low proportion of individuals on treatment in our study population is likely due to the fact that most of the participants (90.1%) were recruited from the hospital setting where they seek medical care. Patients who have been diagnosed HIV positive are more likely to be on treatment, regardless of their HIV status \[[@pone.0202895.ref031]\]. In addition to the significant factors associated with HIV status such as age, sex, educational level and marital status, this study highlights that one-third of the participants live in households with a higher than average wealth index. The economic realities of HIV positive individuals can lead to a significant amount of financial hardship \[[@pone.0202895.ref032]\]. The consequences of living under economic burden to the health of HIV infected persons has been described in other settings \[[@pone.0202895.ref031]\]. The burden is even more significant in resource limited settings where the majority of patients are still at the stage of diagnosis. From this study, it can be inferred that while services are available to diagnosed individuals, those who are undiagnosed are the ones who are more likely to suffer from the consequences of poverty due to the nature of the disease. Access to the healthcare services provided in public clinics in the Kenya city of Kisumu is free of charge. However, in addition to the public clinics, there are a number of private clinics and private hospitals that charge fees to patients. The population in the study area tends to rely on the private health facilities because of the inequity in the access to health care services
