But for all the intrigue surrounding it, art historians believe it probably doesn't belong in the Louvre – instead they argue it should go back home in Kurdistan. It is one of just 39 surviving examples of papyrus created by the artist Moses of Chorene, who lived in ancient Egypt between AD 200-330. The artist used it to copy stories from the Book of the Dead, but the artist died and his work was 'lost' for hundreds of years. In the 1930s, a French dealer who came across some parchments in a Cairo market, thought the work might have come from the 'lost' artist. His name was Gérard Lhéritier and he died in a tragic car accident in 2003. He believed it was the work of Moses of Chorene. Today, art historians from the Getty Museum believe they can prove that this papyrus is one of only four known surviving examples of Moses' work and the only one that is attributed to him. The other pieces were found by a collector in Egypt, on the site of his family's summer home. But the Getty is not willing to let go of the piece, saying: "We feel that this document, bearing the sole known trace of the lost work of Moses, should be returned to the protection of the people of Kurdistan, where it has been in Kurdistan for more than 500 years." The text on the papyrus dates back to about 300 BC and describes the embalming process that a man would undergo for death at that time. It describes how eyes and mouth would be removed by red-hot copper sticks.
