The hypothesis that vitamin D deficiency may be related to a greater consumption of cereal based diets in developing countries was tested in growing lambs by providing a vitamin D-deficient diet (1 microgram cholecalciferol per kilogram diet) with and without zinc (40 mg/kg diet) for 4 wk. Both groups were then switched to a control diet (1 microgram cholecalciferol per kilogram diet), and the hepatic metabolism of vitamin D was investigated when both diets were fed for an additional 4 wk. Absorption and conversion rates of cholecalciferol were assessed in situ by the initial flux technique and conversion was measured by measuring the specific activities of 25-hydroxyvitamin D3 in intestinal mucosa and liver. Twenty lambs weaned at 9 wk of age and were fed grass silage-based diets (13.5% crude protein, 12.8% ether extract, and 76% DM basis) in a completely randomized design (n = 10). The zinc treatment reduced the absorption of cholecalciferol compared with the control diet (P .10). The presence of zinc in the diet improved the growth of the lambs and increased the percentage of 4,5-dihydroxy-1,3-dienes in the bile (P 6d1f23a050
