recommendations]. While the practice of positioning in intensive care units to reduce the risk of nosocomial decubitus ulcers has gained a new level of sophistication, the use of muscle relaxants in this context is widely debated. The main goal of the present review is to orient clinicians toward a better understanding of the role of muscle relaxants in preventing decubitus ulcers. A literature review was performed using the following key words: "positioning", "positioning strategies", "decubitus", "decubitus ulcers", "muscle relaxants", "mivacurium", "succinylcholine", "vecuronium", "rocuronium", "sugammadex" and "atracurium".

Repositioning strategies

vary according to the decubitus stage and include repositioning, skin elevation, skin traction and overlying bandage usage. Muscles relaxants are sometimes employed to maintain the optimal positioning to avoid occurrence of ulcers.

Because their use is challenging (as anesthetic induction and reversal are often required), the main drawback is that they are often not effective enough to reduce decubitus risk. In addition, because the criteria to assess their effectiveness are not sufficiently standardized, their efficacy is difficult to assess. Although not without drawbacks, muscle relaxants can be useful to maintain a good positioning during surgery and in intensive care. A precise benefit-risk evaluation is thus necessary with continued assessment of their efficacy before their use is considered more general.
